Faunce, "but have the great days made us really broader men, or are we still little men creeping through great days? "The founders of our country were individualists. Their thinking was spacious and broadminded, like their colonial architecture. Their buildings often had an amplitude and dignity that we miss in the petty, fussy architecture of a later day. So the intellectual conceptions of the fathers were sometimes much wider than those which followed. When Franklin was representing this country at the Court of Versailles, when our ships were driving the Barbary pirates out of the Mediterranean, when Jefferson was founding the University our ships were driving the Barbary pirates out of the Mediterranean, when Jefferson was founding the University of Virginia and attempting to import the entire faculty of the University of Geneva, when Commodore Perry was knocking at the gates of Japan—then America saw herself definitely as part of the human family and the fathers were moved by a decent respect for the opinions of mankind.

"But when the civil war came our energies were absorbed, hence we were compelled to ignore most of Europe and all of Asia and concentrate our entire strength on the desperate struggle in hand. At the conclusion of the civil war we were more united, more patriotic, but more provincial and narrow minded.

—G. Fox Rules, Osberne, Isle of Wight.

The little animal is not quite so inoffensive as supposed, and the birds know it.

Squirrels whenever they have a chance will help themselves both to eggs and young birds, so that naturally when detected they get "mobbed."—Ed.
